Dorner's integrative explanatory model of human experience and behaviour can be applied to various areas of life. A particularly interesting area is the perception of beauty, because beauty has to do with the fields emotion, motivation, cognition, thinking and learning at the same time (cf. Dorner in Halcour, 2002).

Viewing human mating in a developed nation, one surmises that success in heterosexual competition for mates entails attracting members of the opposite sex. Beauty, fashion, and physical fitness are so important in places like the United States that they have become multi-billion dollar industries. Men and women have virtual autonomy to choose their mates.

Beauty is morally significant and also why the recognition of human beauty is morally significant. Ultimately, of course, Socrates presents contact with forms, including the form of the beautiful, as a source of virtue. The values which inform the best human life are not themselves specifically human.

Images of beauty. The diversity of human beauty has been strained through a sieve of culture, status, power and money and what has emerged is a narrow sliver of the full panorama of human visual splendor. Beauty is diverse and the human eye thrills to new pleasures and fresh sources of inspiration.
